PREFACE.

PREFACE.

I.

The present volume contains the Scottish Exchequer accounts from the accession of James II. to August 1454, a period of seventeen years and a half, during which we have seventeen audits. The place of audit was generally Stirling or Edinburgh; in one instance Linlithgow. The Exchequer of 1450 bears to have been held in the monastery of Holyrood at Edinburgh; in 1453 some few of the accounts are audited at Aberdeen.

The roll with which the volume commences is a fragment; but, with this exception, the accounts of the custumars and bailies of the burghs are complete. There are two accounts of the Comptroller, and a portion of an account of the Treasurer; but the accounts of the Great Chamberlain cease. There are several moneyers' accounts, and a series of accounts of ballivi ad extra or managers of the crown lands, which becomes both more perfect and more important as the volume advances. None of the sheriffs' accounts of the period have been preserved to us.

The reign of James II. cannot be called an uneventful time, whether we look at the vicissitudes of the King's minority, the growth of the influence of the Earls of Douglas, or the means by which the King compassed and achieved the destruction of that family just as they had attained the zenith of their power. Yet this reign has been justly considered one of the obscurest periods of Scottish history. The "Scotichronicon" closes with the murder of James I.; and the available authentic materials to bridge over the gap between that event and the accession of James III. are of a very scanty description. They may be shortly enumerated as follows.

We have first an unknown continuator of Bower, who sums up the occurrences of the reign in two pages.[1]

More important is the "Addicioun of Scottis Croniklis and Deedes," forming part of a manuscript of miscellaneous transcriptions in prose and verse in the handwriting of one John Asloan, a procurator in Edinburgh in the beginning of the sixteenth century, and known as the Asloan MS., or, from its having come into the possession of the Boswell family, the "Auchinleck Chronicle." The historical entries bear every indication of having been copied from some contemporary chronicle, more complete than any that we now possess.

[1] Scotichronicon, ii. pp. 514–516.

Their order is not strictly chronological, particularly towards the close, where there are additions apparently from a different source and partly of an obituary character. The dates, though they can in many cases be proved to be right, are not invariably so. This chronicle was privately printed under the editorship of the late Mr. Thomas Thomson in 1818, in a small volume, whose contents consist first of the entries in the manuscript in their original order, and, secondly, of the same arranged in probable order of date.[1] Notes and illustrations were to have been added, but the accomplished editor unfortunately left his intention in this matter unfulfilled.

In a small volume in the Edinburgh University Library, containing miscellaneous matter, printed and written,. is a manuscript abridgment of the "Scotichronicon," with a continuation beyond the death of James I., transcribed from an earlier manuscript about the year 1521, by John Law, canon of St. Andrews. In it there are a few paragraphs of matter not found elsewhere, of which one has been printed by Mr. Tytler,[2] and another is made use of in this preface.[3]

In the "Extracta e variis Cronicis Scocie,"

[1] In the light of the Exchequer Rolls and other documents now more accessible than they were sixty years ago, the present editor has, as will be seen below, been in some cases led to form conclusions at variance with those of Mr. Thomson as to the dates of particular entries.

printed by the late Mr. W. B. D. D. Turnbull from a manuscript of the sixteenth century, is a brief chronicle of the reign of James II., containing little matter not included in the sources already mentioned, except a notice of James Kennedy, Bishop of Dunkeld. A few additions in the vernacular, ascribed to Sir William Sinclair and printed in footnotes, are almost verbatim identical with passages in the Asloan MS.

The account of this reign by John Major, who wrote in 1521, is much briefer than could be desired.

The chroniclers who have been adverted to, if meagre in their information, are at least not intentionally untruthful, and their statements are entitled to more or less weight: the same cannot be said of the writers who succeeded them.

Hector Boece ended the first edition of his History of Scotland with the death of James I.; but a continuation to the death of James II., though not published till after the author's death, was in circulation in manuscript in his lifetime. Dealing with a period removed by but two generations from his own time, he had yet no thought of adhering to historical truth, but obviously aimed only at constructing a historical romance, in which the events and characters of the time should be grouped and dressed up in a picturesque and artistic fashion, and poetical justice administered among them. His work however was unfortunately accepted as history, and referred to as an authority by the writers who succeeded him. Lindsay of Pitscottie's account of this reign is, almost from beginning to end, a translation of Boece. Buchanan, Bishop Leslie, and Drummond of Hawthornden, give us little but Boece abridged, reproducing his most glaring errors of chronology and fact. Hume of Godscroft, though producing occasionally a legend or tradition preserved in the Douglas family, takes his facts in the main from Boece, and dresses them in such colours as he might expect to be pleasing to his patrons.

Pinkerton, writing before the Asloan MS. had been brought to light, endeavoured as best he could to correct Boece by such information as he could get from the Acts of Parliament, the Register of the Great Seal, and French sources. Tytler, while he makes considerable use of the Asloan MS., has occasionally been misdirected to some extent by the ignis fatuus which led astray his predecessors.

Amid the prevailing dearth of the ordinary sources of information, the Exchequer accounts in this volume and that which is to succeed it have a special value. If they do not enable us to write such a history of this reign as might be desired, they at least furnish a considerable amount of material for that purpose, providing us with new facts, and not unfrequently settling obscure points, explaining the order of events, and rectifying the current chronology.

In the remarks that follow it is the editor's purpose to recapitulate concisely the leading incidents of the period included in this volume, so far as they are known to us, directing attention to the new light thrown on some of them by the Exchequer rolls and other records. More general topics suggested by the Exchequer accounts are reserved for the Introduction to the next volume, which will contain the rolls of the remaining six years of the reign of James III.

II.

Notwithstanding the jealousy with which the policy of James I. in breaking up and annexing the feudal earldoms must have been viewed by the greater nobles, it would be a misrepresentation of facts to describe the assassination of the King as the outcome of this feeling. The conspiracy against James was essentially a dynastic plot, an attempt to vindicate the rights of the second family of Robert II. as against the first; and its real head was one on whom the King had heaped repeated benefits, his uncle, Walter Earl of Athole.

In point of fact the dastardly deed committed in the Dominican monastery of Perth aroused the indignation of the whole country, from the highest nobility down to the peasantry; and the murderers were pursued and brought to justice with all speed. One of them was slain, and another wounded on the spot by Sir David Dunbar of Cockburn, who, though brother of the Earl of March who had received such harsh treatment at James's hands, was the first to arrive to the rescue.[1] The rest escaped for the moment; but before the expiry of a month they had been captured, tried, and put to death: while, in respect of the enormity of their crime, unusual additions were made to the always revolting adjuncts of executions for treason. Robert Stewart, the grandson of Athole, and his associate, Christopher Chalmer, after being dragged through the streets of Edinburgh, Stewart attached to a cross, and both undergoing new and ingeniously devised tortures, were beheaded in the market-place, their quarters distributed over the country, and their heads set on the gates of Perth.[2] Athole, who was soon afterwards apprehended by William Earl of Angus, also suffered in Edinburgh, the mode of his execution indicating how closely the general belief connected the crime that had been committed with his pretensions to the throne in respect of the supposed superior legitimacy of the second family of Robert II. Tied, we are told, to a post, and crowned with a paper diadem, he was decapitated; and his head was fixed on a spear and encircled with an iron crown. Graham, the most prominent actor, and some of the rest, were followed to the fastnesses of the Highlands, and arrested by John Stewart Gorme of Athole and Robert Duncanson, ancestor of the Robertsons of Strowan. The account of the Chamberlain of Athole from 1436 to 1438 contains an entry of £66, 13s. 4d. paid "Johanni Stewart Gorme pro arrestacione Roberti Grahaam, traditoris, et suorum complicum."[1] Robert Duncanson of Strowan had on 15th August 1451 a crown charter erecting his lands of Strowan and others into a barony, for the love and favour borne towards him by the King for the arrest of Robert Graham, and his zeal and labour about his capture.[2] Graham was executed at Stirling. Defiant to the last, he bore the complicated torments inflcted on him with great firmness, vindicating his crime on the ground that he had first renounced his allegiance to his sovereign.

[1] Page 55. John Stewart Gorme is mentioned in the accounts of the Chamberlain of Mar as occupying the lands of Cormuly, Roquharkery, Gleneglis, and Abergeldy, in Mar (pages 57, 61). Six years later, on 24th June 1443, he met his death in the North Inch of Perth when endeavouring to rescue a thief who was being brought to justice by Sir William Ruthven the sheriff, Ruthven being also slain (Asloan MS. pp. 4, 35). From his being called "of Athole" he would seem to have been a grandson of Alexander Stewart Earl of Buchan; while his designation in the Chronicle of Fortingall as "John Gorme M'James" (Black Book of Taymouth, p. 112), suggests that his father was James, natural son of the "Wolf of Badenach." Nevertheless he was not identical with John Stewart of Fortingall, whose death is chronicled of a different date in the record last quoted. Perhaps John Stewart of Fortingall ought rather to be identified with John Stewart son of Duncan, whose name appears in the Mar account in close conjunction with that of John Stewart Gorme. (page 61). The husband of the heiress of Fortingall (and father of John Stewart of Fortingall) is called Duncan son of the "Wolf of Badenach" in Colonel Robertson's "Earldom of Athole" (p. 27), the editor is not aware on what evidence.

A charter of Lawers by James III. to Sir Colin Campbell of Glenorchy bore to be granted in reward for his arrest of Thomas Chalmer, one of the murderers of King James I.[1]

James I. was buried in the church of the Carthusian Convent at Perth, of which he had been the founder. A payment of £30 is to be found in the customs account for twenty "vangis" or "wawis" of Spanish iron delivered to Friar John of Bute, a Cistercian whose name often appears in connection with this convent—"pro apparatu fabricando pro conservacione sepulcri domini nostri regis in ecclesia Cartusiensi prope Perth, in circuitu ejusdem sepulcri";[2] and £48, 12s. 5d. are allowed to one of the custumars of Perth for outlay "circa fabricam tumbe dicti domini nostri regis in opere fabrili, circa clausuram, picturam, et alia requisita pro eadem," on the attestation of the prior of the convent and the same Friar John of Bute.[3] 50s. were allowed for candles of white wax for masses said for the soul of the late King in the parish church of Edinburgh.[4]

Contemporary chroniclers and later historians have alike left untold the fact, that the heart of

The full contemporary account of the death of James I. and punishment of the murderers, which has furnished most of the details given by later historians, is in the British Museum, and has been printed in Pinkerton's History of Scotland, in the "Miscellanea Scotica," vol. ii., and in "The Life and Death of James I. of Scotland" (Maitland Club).

James I., like that of his great ancestor the Bruce, was removed from his body before interment, and carried on a pilgrimage to the East. But the rolls inform us of the arrival in Scotland, about 1443, of a Knight of St. John, bearing from Rhodes the heart of King James, which was presented and exhibited to the Carthusian monks of Perth, no mention, however, being made of its place of final deposit. To the military knight who came on this errand £90 were paid from the customs of Edinburgh,[1] and £1 towards his expenses from the customs of Perth.[2]

James I. had more than once required the Scottish magnates to take the oath of allegiance to his Queen;[3] and it was perhaps in accordance with his formally expressed wish that the custody of his son was placed in her hands. It was also in the Queen's name that the pursuit of her husband's murderers was undertaken. Queen Joan and her children escaped without delay from the dangerous neighbourhood of the Highlands to Edinburgh Castle, and the Abbey of Holyrood had to be substituted for the time-honoured locale of Scone as the scene of the coronation. On the 25th of March 1437, then accounted the first day of the year, a Parliament was convoked at Edinburgh, part of whose proceedings was placing the crown on the head of the King, now in his seventh year, who was brought for that purpose from the Castle to Holyrood, "cum maximo applausu et apparatu ad laudem Dei et leticiam tocius populi."[1] The custumars of Haddington are credited with £134, 3s. 4d., paid by them to Sir William Crichton, keeper of Edinburgh Castle, for the coronation expenses;[2] £100 are paid on Crichton's receipt from the customs of Edinburgh towards the same object, the Queen, it as said, being then in the Castle with her household; and the custumars of Edinburgh are allowed sums amounting altogether to £153 for wheat, Hamburgh ale, Greek wine, and red wine furnished on the same occasion to Crichton,[3] who besides received £50 from the colliery of Tranent (then in ward) for the coronation expenses.[4] A feather mattress and pillow for the King, costing £6, 5s., were sent to Edinburgh Castle;[5] and the defences of Edinburgh Castle were strengthened by [illegible] of Spanish iron.[6] As five weeks had not elapsed from the ghastly scene enacted at the [illegible] onvent at Perth, it almost surprises us to find th[illegible] the service of Martin Vanartyne and the oth[illegible] -players whom the late King had brought [illegible] landers[7] were brought into requisi- [illegible] indolence,- [illegible] all exercise of tion, for which £8 were paid them from the customs of Edinburgh, by order of the Queen and Council.[1]

Hardly any records of this Parliament remain; but the records of the Parliament of 1439 inform us that the Queen was at this time entrusted with, or confirmed in, the custody of the King and the guardianship of his four unmarried sisters.[2] It must also have been this Parliament, perhaps in implement of the will of the late King, that conferred the office of Regent or King's Lieutenant on Archibald Earl of Douglas, who on his mother's side was nephew of James I. Two payments occur to Douglas in part of salary in that character, one of them applicable to the year 1437.[3]

It may be presumed that the proceedings of this Parliament further included the appointment of an embassy to negotiate for the continuance of a truce with England. On 18th September 1437 the English Government granted a safe-conduct to John Cameron Bishop of Glasgow, Alexander Seton Lord Gordon, Sir Walter Ogilvy, [illegible] Sir John Forrester, as ambassadors of the King of Scots;[4] but the ambassadors who act[illegible] England were Lord Gordon, Lord [illegible] John Methven, Provost of Lincluden, [illegible] Secretary, and John Vaus.[5] A tru[illegible] by them with the King of England's [illegible] first day [illegible] at Edinburg[illegible] to last for nine years from the 1st May 1438.[1] The customs account of Dundee of 1438 contains a payment of £60 for the expenses of Lord Gordon and Alexander of Montgomery, as ambassadors to England;[2] and that of Aberdeen of 1441, a payment of £45 for the releasing from pawn of jewels of the King pledged for the expenses of Lord Gordon and the other ambassadors.[3] On 28th March 1438, George Faulau, merchant in Edinburgh, whose name is of frequent occurrence in these accounts, had a safe-conduct to go through England to Holland to notify the truce to Scots residents in the Low Countries.[4]

Archibald fifth Earl of Douglas and fourth Duke of Touraine was the most wealthy and powerful subject of the Scottish Crown; and his prominent position, as well as his near relationship to the sovereign, had not unnaturally pointed him out as the fittest person to wield the supreme power in the King's minority. If he was in the habit of lookin[illegible] [illegible]rom a vantage ground of superiority on th[illegible] [illegible]obles of the land, it was probably expe[illegible] would be the better able to control the [illegible]urbule[illegible] the lesser magnates. But these expectations [illegible]ed delusive. The rôle which Douglas affected,—and that from hauteur rather than indolence,—was to abstain ostentatiously from all exercise of the chief functions that might have been supposed to devolve on the head of the government. Not only did he take no steps to restrain the private feuds and disorders which had broken out afresh on the death of James I., but he looked on with seeming unconcern at the spectacle of Sir William Crichton and Sir Alexander Livingston, as heads of two opposite factions in the state, contending for the possession of the person of the young King.

The men in power were in fact not the heads of the great feudal houses, but all belonged to secondary or less considerable families. Crichton, the representative of a hitherto unconspicuous baronial family, seems to have been a trusted servant of James I., by whom he was made sheriff of Edinburgh,[1] master of the royal household,[2] and keeper of Edinburgh Castle with a salary of £100.[3] It is doubtful whether Livingston had been equally in the confidence of the first James. He had a share in the negotiations for the King's release, and was one of the assize who convicted the Albanys; but his name is not other[illegible] prominent in the transactions of that reign: [illegible] annuity of £28 from the customs of Lin[illegible], which he had enjoyed from the time of R[illegible] III., was, like many similar pensions, discontinued on James's return from captivity. Pinkerton's conjecture that he was appointed keeper of the King's person by the will of James I. seems to rest on no solid basis of evidence.

Crichton's position as governor of Edinburgh Castle when the Queen and young King fled from Perth, gave him an influence which an ambitious man might be expected to use to his own advantage. The accounts rendered in July 1438 indicate that, from the death of James I. onwards, he had habitually uplifted a large proportion of the fermes of the crown demesnes and lands in ward south of the Forth.[1] We have no trustworthy account of the circumstances under which the young King passed out of his custody into that of Livingston. According to Boece, whose story is, as usual, accepted by the succeeding generation of historians, Crichton and Livingston were respectively Chancellor and Governor of the realm; and the disposition of the former to exercise the powers of his office à l'outrance, and his determination to keep possession of the King, made him obnoxious to the Queen-moth[illegible]ose sympathies lay more with the [illegible] Queen d[illegible]ion. Dissembling her unfriendline[illegible] his pres[illegible] [illegible]vised means to remove her son f[illegible]nt asylum by stratagem. Star[illegible]age to the church of St. Mary of W[illegible]ekirk, [illegible]aled the young King in a chest which formed p[illegible] of her luggage; and instead of directing her steps towards that popular shrine, she went on board a ship at Leith, and made her way by water to Stirling Castle, then under Livingston's command. We now know that the Governor of the realm was not Livingston but Douglas, and that the Chancellor was not Crichton but Bishop Cameron of Glasgow; and the remaining details of the story, uncorroborated as they are by any independent authority, are not very probable. Turning to the record evidence on this subject, an entry in the customs account of Edinburgh rendered in July 1438 seems almost to imply that the Queen was no longer resident in Edinburgh Castle, though she had been so at the time of the coronation.[1] On the other hand, there is evidence that the King was present at the Parliament held at Edinburgh on the 27th November 1438, which continued its sittings till 24th December.[2] But that the King had been removed to the custody of Livingston at Stirling before March 13th 1438–9, appears from the records of the Council held of that date, which passed measures obviously directed against Crichton. In one of the two fragments which has been preserv[illegible] proceedings of this last-named meeting[illegible] [illegible]uncil [illegible]tes, the Lord-Lieutenant and King's Co[illegible] [illegible]rected to hold two sessions in the year; in[illegible] [illegible]e Lord-

Lieutenant is directed to arrest and bring to justice rebels reset within castles, or persons suspected of rebellion in castles.[1]

Of what followed we have again only Boece's account, to the effect that Livingston laid siege to Edinburgh Castle, and a capitulation followed on terms not unfavourable to Crichton. A temporary fusion of the two factions seems, in fact, to have been brought about by a consideration of the risk which each ran if Douglas, abandoning the isolated attitude which he could hardly longer maintain, should give his support to the other; and it was probably one of the conditions of this coalition that Crichton should be made Chancellor. He superseded the Bishop of Glasgow in that office in May or June 1439.[2]

The unexpected death by fever of the Earl of [1] Acts of the Parliaments of Scotland, ii. p. 32.

[2] Not long afterwards, Bishop Cameron, who, during the strife of James I. with the Pope regarding the interference of the legislature with matters spiritual (vol. iv. preface, page cxi.), had been excommunicated, suspended, and interdicted, made his peace with Rome. Shortly before the death of James I., Antonio di Santo Vito, Bishop of Urbino, had arrived in Scotland as papal legate, with a view to healing the breach. But the disorganised state into which the country was thrown by the King's murder led him to re-cross the Alps without achieving anything. On 19th November 1438, Alfonso de Crucifebris obtained a safe-conduct to pass through England on his way to Scotland as papal nuncio (Rotuli Scotiæ, ii. p. 311); and on 28th February 1439–50, we find a passport granted to William Croyser, who in 1433 had been deprived of his Archdeaconry of Teviotdale for presuming to cite the Bishop of Glasgow to Rome, authorising him to come from Calais to England in order to visit Scotland as nuncio (Rotuli Scotiæ, ii. p. 315). Croyser on this occasion absolved Cameron from the church censures which he had incurred in the preceding reign.—(Theiner's Vetera Monumenta, p. 375; Preface to Concilia Scotiæ, p. lxxxviii.)

Douglas in the prime of life, on the 26th of June 1439, removed out of the way the only restraining influence which could have been brought to bear on the possessors of the young King's person. The Queen-mother, finding her son once more a prisoner, and herself more powerless than ever, sought for protection in a marriage with Sir James Stewart, popularly known as the Black Knight of Lorn, younger son of Sir John Stewart of Innermeath. If the Knight of Lorn and the Queen are, as there seems every reason to believe, the parties meant in a dispensation of date 21st September 1439 for the marriage of James Stewart and Johanna Berrford (Beaufort), of the diocese of St. Andrews[1] (neither of the parties being further designed), it would appear that the marriage was at first private, "per verba de præsenti" before witnesses, and entered into in ignorance, or alleged ignorance, of three different impediments whose existence was afterwards discovered, and to remove which the dispensation was applied for.[2]

[1] Andrew Stuart's History of the Stewarts, p. 443.

[2] They are said to be related in the third and third, fourth and fourth, and third and fourth degrees of consanguinity and affinity. The editor has not succeeded in tracing any one of these three relationships; but he is unaware who the mother and paternal grandmother of the Black Knight were. That his mother was not Janet of Lorn has been shown by Mr Alexander Sinclair (Herald and Genealogist, vi. p. 589). In the male line, Sir John Stewart and James I. were each fifth in descent from Alexander fourth High Steward, which did not bring them within the prohibited degrees. The dispensation enjoins, by way of penalty for having continued to live together for some time after the impediments had been discovered, that on the death of either of the spouses the survivor is to remain unmarried.

The Queen's marriage did not, nevertheless, benefit her position, and its immediate results are sufficiently startling. On the 3rd of August 1439 her chamber at Stirling was forcibly invaded by Livingston, and herself removed to a place of restraint, notwithstanding the resistance of her household; while her husband and his brother William Stewart were thrust into the dungeon of the Castle and put in fetters. For these occurrences we have the authority of the Asloan MS.,[1] and also the evidence of a charter granted by James II. ten years later to Alexander Naper of the lands of Philde, for his faithful services to the late Queen his mother, and in compensation for severe bodily injuries, wounds, and personal damage sustained by him on the occasion of the violent capture and incarceration of the Queen by Sir Alexander Livingston, James Livingston his son, and their accomplices.[2]

A month after this outrage, on 4th September 1439, we have the spectacle of a General Council assembled at Stirling giving its sanction to a formal indenture between the Queen on the one hand, and Sir Alexander Livingston of Callendar, his son and heir James, his brother John, and Sir

[1] Asloan MS., pp. 3, 34. The expression used regarding Sir James Stewart and his brother is "put tham in pittis and bollit thaim." The Belgian boei, a shackle, alluded to in Jamieson's Dictionary under the word "Bow," seems to suggest a preferable explanation of the meaning of this passage to those given in the same work under "Bollit."

William Cranstoun on the other, by which she resigned the custody of her son till his majority into the hands of the Livingstons and Cranstouns. The Castle of Stirling and her allowance of 4000 marks were also surrendered by her for the King's maintenance. It was stipulated that she was to have access to her son in the presence of unsuspected persons, and in the event of the death of Sir Alexander Livingston he was to be restored to her keeping. The Queen further declared that she remitted to the Livingstons all the rancour which she had wrongly conceived against them, and that she was satisfied that they had imprisoned her from motives of loyalty, and out of zeal for their sovereign's safety, and engaged that neither Livingston nor any of his friends should at any future time be brought into trouble for their share in these transactions.[1] Sir James Stewart and his brother were at the same time released from durance.

It would seem, however, that the results of the compact made on the surrender of Edinburgh Castle had not proved altogether satisfactory to Crichton, who found that it was decidedly Livingston and not himself who was now the first person in the realm; and the historians of the reign relate how the Chancellor, by kidnapping the King early one morning in Stirling Park, and conveying him to Edinburgh, succeeded in obtaining from his quondam antagonist more favourable terms for himself and his friends.

But the house of Douglas had not ceased to be a source of apprehension to Livingston and Crichton. Earl William was but a boy of sixteen when he succeeded, but they soon foresaw in him a dangerous enemy. Imperious, extravagant, and ambitious, he is admitted even by Hume of Godscroft to have refused to acknowledge the authority of government, and to have acted with more than kingly power. We know not how far his acts may have technically rendered him amenable to the treason laws, or in what ways he made himself obnoxious to the governing party. On the 24th November 1440, the young Earl and his only brother, with their friend and confidant, Malcolm Fleming, a man in advanced years, the brother-in-law of the Regent Murdach—and who is said to have been sent as ambassador by Douglas to the French Court to convey his homage for the duchy of Touraine—were arrested within Edinburgh Castle on a charge of treason. The Earl and his brother, after a hasty trial, were convicted and beheaded, and three or four days later the same fate overtook Fleming.

The bare outline here given contains nearly all that is known of this story from authentic sources.[1]

What substratum of truth there may be in the further particulars which have found their way through Boece into our ordinary histories it is difficult to say. In one particular Boece departs from the Asloan MS. He makes the execution of Fleming simultaneous with that of the Douglases; and there he is certainly wrong, as shown by a curious document in the Cumbernauld charter chest,[1] which, while it accords with the other accounts as to the haste with which the trials were conducted, proves that four days elapsed between the death of the Douglases and that of Fleming.

By Douglas's conviction and execution for treason his earldom and estates ought to have been forfeited; but the party in power did not venture to annex them to the Crown. There is indeed strong reason to surmise that Livingston and Crichton had acted with the full sanction or at least connivance of the next heir to the earldom, namely James Earl of Avondale, brother of Archibald fourth Earl of Douglas, and great-uncle of the beheaded Earl, formerly James Douglas of Balveny, the assassin in former days of Sir David Fleming, father of Earl William's friend and fellow-victim, and frequently brought under notice in the accounts of the Albany regency in connexion with his depredations on the customs. At all events, the earldom of Douglas was bestowed on the Earl of Avondale; and the fee of the lordship of Galloway[1] allowed to vest, as it would have done had there been no attainder, in the heir of line, Margaret, sister of the late Earl, popularly distinguished as the Fair Maid of Galloway. Annandale, which had been granted by charter of the Regent Albany to Archibald fourth Earl and the heirs male of his body, whom failing to the Earl of March,[2] was taken possession of by the Crown as coming in place of the forfeited Earl of March; but it would rather appear that the King had at first a little difficulty in obtaining possession of the rents, and there are indications that the later Earls of Douglas looked on themselves as unjustly deprived of them.[3] The duchy of Touraine and county of Longueville reverted to the French Crown.

In the course of the year 1441 ambassadors arrived from John Duke of Brittany, with an offer of marriage from his eldest son, Francis Count of Montfort, to Elizabeth or Isabel, second daughter of James I. The proposal was favourably entertained, and an embassy was despatched to the court of Brittany. The ambassadors chosen were Sir George Crichton of Cairnes and Blackness, a kinsman of the Chancellor, who held the important office of Admiral of Scotland, and becomes still more conspicuous a few years later, William Foulis Archdeacon of St. Andrews, and William Monypenny, who, as Sir William Monypenny of Concressault in France, reappears afterwards as a much trusted and often employed envoy between the courts of Scotland and France.[1] The contract was signed 19th July 1441, when it was arranged that the lady Elizabeth was to receive from her brother a dowry of 100,000 saluts d'or, while the Duke settled on her a jointure of £6000. The Aberdeen customs account of 1442 contains a payment of £45 to Sir George Crichton of Blackness toward his expenses on an embassy to Brittany to treat of this marriage.[2] The bride sailed for Brittany with a large train of attendants, and was married on the 30th October 1442. Her husband had two months previously succeeded to the dukedom by his father's death.

James seventh Earl of Douglas, during his three years' possession, kept on a good footing with the governing faction, to whom he owned his earldom; and it seems to have been a period freer than usual from internal disturbances, though a payment occurs of £5 to Nicholas the King's carpenter for riding to Galashiels (then in Ettrick Forest and in possession of the Douglases) to bring back (pro levacione) the King's great bombard.[1] Earl James had interest enough to obtain for his second son Archibald the earldom of Moray, with the hand of Elizabeth, younger of the two daughters of the last Earl of Moray of the Dunbar family, to the exclusion of that lady's elder sister, afterwards wife of Crichton's son. By the only known or recorded investiture of this earldom, the charter granted to John Dunbar and Marjory his wife in 1371–2, the remainder was "heredibus quibuscunque," which would have given the elder sister Janet the earldom. But it seems probable that there was a resignation and re-grant to heirs male after that date; as is furthur suggested by the mention in the Asloan MS. of James Crichton, husband of the elder sister, being belted Earl of Moray in 1452.[2]

[1] He had a charter on 1st May 1451 of the lands of Hallis of Erth in Stirlingshire, to be called in future the lands of Monypenny, and on 7th October 1458 of lands forfeited by the Earl of Ormond.—Reg. Mag. Sig., l. v. nos. 16. 17.

[2] See below, page xcvi. There is in the Castle Forbes charter-chest a charter, dated 26th April 1442, of the lordship of Kintore,—a possession of the Earls of Moray since 1375,—to Archibald, son of James Earl of Douglas, on the resignation of Janet and Elizabeth, daughters of the late James Dunbar Earl of Moray, with a remainder, failing the issue male of the said Archibald and Elizabeth, to the other sons of James Earl of Douglas in the first instance, and only on their failure to the heirs whatsoever of Elizabeth Dunbar. This charter is printed in the "Antiquities of the Shires of Aberdeen and Banff" (Spalding Club), iii. p. 231, where, the regnal year being supposed to be that of the third and not the second James, it is assigned to 1466 instead of 1442. In the face of this document it is impossible to maintain the hypothesis (see Riddell's Peerage and Consistorial Law, p. 866), that Elizabeth was daughter of Thomas Earl of Moray of the elder line, and Janet of Earl James of the line of Frendraught.

William, eldest son of Earl James, who succeeded him as eighth Earl of Douglas on 25th March 1443, was both crafty and ambitious. He is said to have made a pleasing impression on James at an interview obtained by him in order to disavow responsibility for a lawless act of one of his followers, the seizure of Dumbarton Castle on the 15th July 1443 by Patrick of Galbraith; and he soon became a prime favourite of the young King, who had attained the age of thirteen, and was beginning to chafe under the irksomeness of his tutelage. The result of this new influence was the disgrace of the Crichtons, a coalition between the Livingston party and Douglas, and the appointment of the latter to the office of Lieutenant-Governor of the realm.

On 20th August 1443, Douglas with a large host laid siege in the King's name to the house of Barnton near Edinburgh, the property of Sir George Crichton the admiral, which four days afterwards capitulated, and was levelled with the ground.[1]

On 4th November following a Council was held at Stirling, to which Sir William and Sir George Crichton were summoned, and, on their failure to appear, were outlawed and attainted.[2] Sir William was superseded in the Chancellorship by James

Bruce Bishop of Dunkeld, soon afterwards Bishop of Glasgow.[1]

We next find the two Crichtons harrying and plundering the lands of Douglas and his adherent Sir John Forrester of Corstorphine in Lothian, carrying off horses, sheep, and cattle, and setting fire to the granges of Abercorn and Strabrock: while Douglas revenged himself on Sir George Crichton by burning Blackness.[2]

Douglas further strengthened his position by obtaining a dispensation to marry his cousin the Fair Maid of Galloway, and thus reunite her domains with his;[3] while the title of Earl of Ormond, in connexion with the lands of Ardmannach in Ross, was bestowed on his brother Hugh.

Meantime the relations with England were of a friendly description, and a prolongation of the truce to 1st May 1454 was agreed on;[4] in connexion with which there occurs a payment in the Edinburgh customs account of 1444 of £41 to Alexander Lord Montgomery, "pro treugis capiendis apud Dunelmiam."[5] On 5th December 1444 a safe-conduct was granted to ambassadors from Scotland, one of them being Monypenny, who were to be present at the coronation of Margaret of Anjou, Queen of Henry VI.[1]

The events of 1444 included a marriage and a betrothal in the royal house of Scotland. Mary, fifth daughter of James I, and youngest but one of the King's sisters, still in childhood, became wife of Wolfaert van Borselen, Count of Grandpré and Lord of Campvere in Zealand. From Dutch sources we learn that she was sent from Scotland to Campvere under charge of Jonkheer Luyeh van Schingen and other Dutch gentlemen.[2] On 14th December her youngest sister Annabella was betrothed at Stirling to Louis Count of Geneva, second son of Louis Duke of Savoy, in presence of ambassadors from that Prince,[3] a contract which was eleven years afterwards broken off. Excepting a few entries for articles of dress to the sisters of the king,[4] there is no reference to these events in the existing Exchequer accounts.

Among the counsellors of the young King there was happily one in whom intellect, wisdom, and courage were combined with a disinterested attachment to his sovereign. We mean James Kennedy, Bishop of St. Andrews and nephew of James I., a prelate whose singleness of purpose and purity of character stand out in bright relief in an age when such qualities were rare. He regarded with alarm the coalition between Douglas and Livingston; the more so that Douglas was understood to be closely united in friendship with another very powerful and very unscrupulous noble, David third Earl of Crawford. With the view of throwing his weight into the opposite scale, Kennedy made advances to Sir William Crichton, on whose side was also the representative of a branch of the house of Douglas that was shortly to come to the front, James Earl of Angus. To retaliate on this prelate, Crawford, in company with Alexander Ogilvy of Innerquharity, James Livingston younger of Callendar, James Hamilton of Cadyow, Robert Reoch Duncanson, and a body of friends and dependants, made an inroad on his territories, laying waste his lands, burning his granges, and carrying off a rich booty to their fastnesses in Angus: upon which the sacrilegious Earl and his abettors were solemnly excommunicated by the Bishop for the space of a year.[1]

The scanty chronicles of the period have preserved the memory of a few of the numerous other private outrages of the period, including the slaughter of Sir James Stewart of Ardgowan at Drumglass on the 31st May 1445 by Robert Boyd, and brutal maltreatment of his wife.[2]

[1] Asloan MS., pp. 7, 38. [2] Asloan MS., pp. 6, 37.

A Parliament convened at Perth on 14th June 1445 was, we are told, adjourned to Edinburgh, on the ground that the coalition who had now possession of the King were besieging the late Chancellor in Edinburgh Castle.[1] It outlawed and forfeited James Earl of Angus for rebellion.[2] Edinburgh Castle made so good a defence that when Crichton capitulated, after a nine weeks' siege, he was able to obtain a promise of remission for all past offences and a renewal of the King's favour.

Some glimpes of light are thrown on passing events by the accounts audited at Stirling in June 1444 and at Edinburgh in July 1445. In the former, Kennedy is not called Chancellor, showing that if he had been invested with the office, as has been stated, on Crichton's forfeiture, he held it but a very short time. The seizure of Dumbarton had been so far condoned that a payment of £6, 13s. 4d. is allowed to Patrick Galbraith for his expenses at Dumbarton Castle before its delivery to Robert of Callendar.[3] The references to Crichton's varying fortunes help to fix the dates of events.[4]

[4] In the Edinburgh account of 1444 is a payment of 8s. 6d., "pro tribus instrumentis per compotantes, ex parte regis, super citacione domini de Creichtoun, et super inhibicione per compotantes facta ne processus procedat super terris domini regis de Castellaw" (page 147). While at the audit of 1443 a pension of 700 marks, to continue till the King's majority, had been paid or at least acknowledged to be due to Crichton (page 125), the annuity in question is in the audit of 1444 designed an "alleged" pension (pages 146, 148). But at the Exchequer of 1445, which must have immediately followed the sur-

Large payments appear, both in 1444 and 1445, connected with the castle of Dalkeith. Dalkeith was the seat of a branch of the Douglas family only second in importance to the ostensible head of the house.[1] They owned Aberdour in Fife, and large possessions in Liddesdale, as well as the fortalice of Dalkeith, a place of importance and strength. Sir James Douglas of Dalkeith, who died shortly before the return of James I. from England, was distinguished for his learning and accomplishments, had entertained Froissart as a guest, owned a large collection of books, and had borrowed others from his friends, which he enjoined in his will should be returned them. He married for his second wife a daughter of Robert II.; and his son and successor James, Lord Dalkeith, one of the first persons dignified with the title of a Lord of Parliament, married a daughter of Robert III., and died about 1440. But the eldest surviving son of the latter, either before or shortly after his succession, became insane, and was declared so in Parliament on 22nd May 1441, when the King as his curator constituted James Gifford of Sheriffhall, whose sister Douglas had married, his substitute in the office of curatory, and constable of the castles of Dalkeith and Aberdour, for nineteen years, with remainders to John and William, brothers of James Gifford.[1] In these troublous times great importance seems to have been attached by the ruling party to the provisioning and garrisoning of Dalkeith. In addition to Gifford, who, with his brother, gets £10 as keeper of the middle ward of the castle, Patrick Cockburn gets 20 marks yearly for keeping the castle, and large sums are allowed him as expended on the buildings, and for iron and Baltic timber used for repairing and strengthening them; the whole expenditure on this fortress in the Edinburgh accounts of 1444 and 1445 being £122, 15s. 5d.[2]

A forgotten incident of this civil war, alluded to in the accounts of 1445, is the siege of Methven castle. Methven, which had been granted by Robert II. to his son Walter Earl of Athole, became the property of the Crown on Athole's attainder. The castle must have been occupied by one of the

[1] The appointment of curatory is printed, from the original in Lord Morton's possession, in the "Registrum Honoris de Morton" (Bannatyne Club), ii. p. 207. In the Register of the Great Seal, the record of it has, by an oversight, been misdated by eleven years (it appears as of 22nd May 1452), a blunder which has been productive of a large amount of error in the accepted genealogies of the Morton family.

[2] The items in the accounts include £26, 13s. 4d. to Patrick Cockburn for repair of dwellings in Dalkeith castle (page 146); £14, 13s. 4d. to do. for do. (page 150); £10 to do. for do. (page 150); £1, 11s. 6d. for nine boards and six stones of iron (p. 147); £10 to James Gifford and his brother (page 147); 6s. for four boards of Prussian timber (page 150); £6, 12s. for 80 boards of Prussian timber, with carriage in three waggons from Leith (page 150); £8, 13s. 4d. for 100 boards with carriage (page 180); £8, 2s. for do.; £13, 6s. 8d. to William Livingston for repair of castle (page 180); £9, 10s. 7d. for 100 boards and 11 stones iron with carriage (page 181); and £13, 6s. 8d. as fee of Patrick Cockburn, for custody of castle (page 182).

supporters of Crichton, for we learn by the accounts that it was besieged and captured in 1444 or 1445, the King, now in his fifteenth year, being present at the siege.[1]

On the 15th July in the year of the siege of Edinburgh, that is the year 1445, the Asloan MS. tells us that the Queen-mother died in Dunbar, and was interred in the Carthusian convent of Perth.[2] In the account of the custumars of Inverkeithing, rendered at Edinburgh only two days later, on 17th July 1445, she is called "quondam regina."[3] Boece and the historians who follow him relate that the Queen's second husband had predeceased her, a

At the same audit, Alexander Ogilvy of Innerquharity (who fell a few months later mortally wounded at the battle of Arbroath) is allowed £20, 4s. 11d., in part of his pension as keeper of Methven castle (page 201). At the succeeding audit, Alexander Livingston, as captain of that fortress, is allowed £10 for the purchase of necessaries for Methven castle (page 219), and is further paid £5, 9s. 4d. for his expenses at the time when the same castle was taken (page 230).

[2] Under what circumstances she had come to be an inmate of the fortress of Dunbar, which was then in forcible possession of Patrick Hepburn of Hailes, is not explained; but it is added, that "incontinent the Lord Halis gaf our the castell of Dunbar throu trety," (Asloan MS., pp. 7, 38). A letter from James II. in the chartulary of Coldingham, dated 28th April 1446, refers to "the maist treasonable takyn of our castle of Dunbar, burning her ships, slaughter, imprisonment, oppression of our people, destruction of our land, and many other detestable enormities and offences done by one Patrick of Hepburn, sone till Adam Hepburn of Hales, knight" (Raine's History of North Durham, Appendix, p. 22). At the audit of 1448, £40 are allowed to Patrick Cockburn, for his labours and expenses connected with the siege of Dunbar (page 305).

captive in Flanders. That he survived her by more than six years appears by English safe-conducts granted to him on 24th November 1445, 22d November 1447, and 17th August 1451.[1]

Very soon after the Queen's death, the ladies Joanna and Eleanor, the third and fourth of the daughters of James I., and the only two of them who were not either married or betrothed, were sent to the Court of France. In the account of the custumars of Linlithgow rendered 6th July 1446, there is a remission of custom to the extent of £26, 13s. 4d., to James Livingston, brother of Robert Livingston, the Comptroller and a custumar of Linlithgow (a different person from James Livingston younger of Callendar), for his expenses in accompanying the King's sisters on their voyage to France.[2]

These ladies, on their arrival, found their sister the Dauphiness dead, the victim, as has been often related, of the calumnies of Jamet de Tillay. Charles VII., however, was disposed to act a friendly part to the sisters of his daughter-in-law, now committed to his charge. The circumstance that the

(pp. 24, 41), belonging to the additions which seem to be less trustworthy than the rest, and repeated almost verbatim in the vernacular notes to the "Extracta e variis Cronicis Scociæ" (p. 238), states that Sir James Stewart, the Queen's knight, was captured at sea with eight score Englishmen, and put to death in May 1449. If the information be otherwise correct, its date at least is wrong.

elder of the two was deaf and dumb[1] was doubtless an obstacle to her making an advantageous marriage; but it is less apparent why Eleanor had been left out of consideration, while her younger sisters, though but children, had been married and betrothed the previous year. The French King first of all formed a design that Eleanor should replace her sister as wife of the Dauphin; but finding it impossible to obtain the Pope's sanction for so strange a union, he turned his thoughts towards the Archduke Sigmund of Austria, then about nineteen years of age, as a suitable parti for her. Eleanor of Scotland, sister of the Duchess of Bretagne, is mentioned by Lobineau

[1] It is not from any contemporary source that we learn that the lady Joanna laboured under this bodily infirmity. The evidence of it was first pointed out in a privately printed pamphlet by the late Mr. Alexander Sinclair, as existing in a place where one would hardly have looked for it, namely in a process of divorce at the instance of Hugh third Earl of Eglinton against Joanna Hamilton, his wife, in 1562, on the plea of relationship within the prohibited degrees, the proceedings in which are preserved in the Eglinton charter-chest. Evidence was given that the parties stood to each other in the fourth degree of consanguinity on both sides, the common ancestress being the Countess of Morton or Lady Dalkeith, known as the "muta domina," the genealogy being deduced as follows :—

The Dumb Lady

1. John Earl of Morton	1. Joanna Countess of Bothwell
2. James Earl of Morton	2. Margaret Hepburn, Lady Seton
3. Margaret, wife of James Lord Hamilton	3. Mariot Seton, Countess of Eglinton
4. Joanna Hamilton	4. Hugh Earl of Eglinton

It does not admit of doubt that the mother of John Earl of Morton and Joanna Countess of Bothwell, here called the "muta domina," was the third daughter of James I.

as in the train of the Queen of France on a visit paid by her to Mont St. Michel on St. John Baptist's day 1447.[1] An extant letter of James II., of 1st September 1447, thanks Charles VII. for his outlay connected with the betrothal of his sister Eleanor to the Duke of Austria, to which he gives his hearty assent.[2] Eleanor remained at the French Court until her marriage, which took place in 1449; and her sister Joanna seems also to have continued in France.

Prominent among the factions and skirmishes of that time was the feud between the Lindsays and Ogilvys, which culminated in the battle of Arbroath and death of David Earl of Crawford. The Abbot and convent of Arbroath had some years before this time appointed Alexander Master of Crawford, eldest son of the Earl, their justiciary. But the extravagance and ferocity which afterwards won for him the sobriquet of "The Tiger Earl," rendered him an unsatisfactory protector of the abbey; and the monks formally deposed him, putting Alexander Ogilvy of Innerquharity in his place. The Master of Crawford, indisposed to submit to this affront, took violent possession of the town and abbey of Arbroath, and both parties assembled their friends and followers to decide the quarrel by the sword. The Lindsays were aided by the Douglases and Hamiltons; and accident gave the Ogilvys a powerful ally in Sir Alexander Seton of Gordon, soon afterwards Earl of Huntly, who, happening to be guest for a night at Innerquharity, was bound by the then understood usages of hospitality to take part in his host's quarrel. As the combatants were about to meet in mortal encounter, the Earl of Crawford, suddenly appearing in the field, rushed between them in hope to arrange the quarrel, when a partisan of the Ogilvys, ignorant of who he was, wounded him mortally. This incident naturally embittered the contest; the two armies fought with desperation, the Lindsays winning the day, and a large number of the gentry of Angus being left dead on the field. Innerquharity, severely wounded, was carried to the castle of Finhaven, where, it is said, he was smothered with a down pillow by his cousin, the widowed Countess of Crawford.[1] The battle took place, according to the Asloan manuscript, on 23rd January 1445–6, exactly a year after Crawford's harrying of the lands of the Bishop of St. Andrews, for which it was regarded as a providential retribution; and it is added by the same authority, that the body of the Earl lay four days above ground, as no one durst bury him till the Bishop sent the Prior of St. Andrews to remove the excommunication.[2]

Further than the mention of the death of the Earl of Crawford in the accounts audited in July 1446,[1] the extant rolls contain no allusion to the battle of Arbroath.

Among events unchronicled by historians and obscurely hinted at in the rolls is the possession of the royal castle of Lochdune in Carrick by the M'Lellans: certain expenses are allowed to them on its surrender by them to Sir Alexander Livingston.[2] From that time a regular annual payment occurs to Edward Mure as keeper of Lochdune Castle.[3]

The Court held the Christmas of 1466 at Stirling, when £7, 13s. 8d. was paid for the dresses of players who appeared before the King.[4]

It has been seen that the truce with England, which would else have expired on 1st May 1447, was in 1444 prolonged to 1st May 1454,[5] and it is therefore rather puzzling to find something like an assumption in the transactions between the countries that 1447 was the year of its expiry. Mention occurs in the accounts rendered in 1448 of a mission to England noticed elsewhere. Robert Livingston of Linlithgow (the Comptroller) is allowed £44, 16s. in part payment of his passage to England to the Cardinal and Marquis of Dorset (Edmund Duke of Somerset, uncle of James II.), and a stay of five weeks in England in connection with the King's affairs.[6] Livingston's visit to England cannot have been later than April 1447, as Cardinal Beaufort died in that month.

In the spring of 1448 Border hostilities broke out. The English burned Dunbar and Dumfries, and the Scots retaliated by two raids under the Earls of Douglas, Orkney, Angus, and Ormond, in one of which Alnwick, and in the other Warkworth, was set fire to; and in October of the same year the Earl of Ormond and Wallace of Craigie, with a force of 4000, encountered a much larger number of English on the banks of the Sark, and totally routed them.[1]

The King being now in his eighteenth year, it was considered desirable that he should marry; and the unfriendly nature of the relations with England made it a matter of moment that the marriage should be one that would cement closer the national ties to France. In January 1447–8 Snowdon herald was sent to the French King, with a letter to say that an embassy would shortly be sent by James on the subject of his own marriage and the marriage of his sisters.[1] In September following, Lord Crichton, who was again Chancellor, John

Sisters in the plural are specified, though the only sister of the King who was not already married or betrothed was Joanna, "the dumb lady." The Duchess of Brittany was not yet a widow. Probably the two who were meant were Joanna and Eleanor, the latter being not yet married, though betrothed to Sigmund of Austria.

Ralston Bishop of Dunkeld, and Nicholas of Otterburn, were sent to France on the confidential mission alluded to.[1] The ancient league was ratified on the 31st December 1448 ; and as there was then no French princess who could be a suitable match for the King of Scots, the ambassadors, at the suggestion of the French King, proceeded to the Court of Philip the Good of Burgundy. That Prince recommended his kinswoman, Mary, daughter of Arnold Duke of Gueldres, who had been brought up at the Burgundian Court, and whom the envoys found "jam nubilem et formosam." After returning to Paris to consult Charles VII., they brought the matrimonial negotiation to a close at Brussels. Philip was to pay 60,000 crowns as the portion of the bride, while the Queen's dower of 10,000 crowns was secured on lands in Strathern, Athole, Methven, and Linlithgow.[2] It has been thought that the daughter of the Duke of Gueldres had not in the first instance been thought of by the King of Scots and his advisers; nevertheless, the Edinburgh account rendered in July 1447 makes mention of the mission of one Otto of Puflich, a knight of Gueldres, to the King, during the year embraced by it.[3]

While the negotiations were pending, mutual intercourse went on between the Courts of Burgundy and Scotland; and a tournament between two knights and an esquire of each country was held in the presence of the King at Stirling on the 25th February 1448–9, the Scottish knights being James Master of Douglas, brother of the Earl, and another James Douglas, brother of the laird of Lochleven.[1]

To this date seems to belong the palace as distinct from the abbey of Holyrood. While Holyrood abbey had in previous reigns been a frequent resort of royalty, and James II. had been both born and crowned there, it is generally understood that the palace, as separate from the abbey, had no existence till far on in the reign of James IV.[2] But an entry which occurs in the Edinburgh customs account rendered in 1449, of a sum of £119, 10s. 11d., allowed for boards, iron rafters, carriages, and freights connected with the King's work in the monastery of Holyrood, and at Stirling, Linlithgow, and Falkland,[3] seems to indicate the building of a royal dwelling there, not improbably

A sum of £12, 19s. 1d. allowed, inter alia, for lances and spears for jousting, in the accounts of 1450 (page 385), may have reference to this tournament. A rather obscure allusion to the Master of Douglas occurs in connexion with an unrecorded event of about this date. The custumars of Edinburgh in 1449 take credit for £5, 12s. as price of 14 bolls of wheat bought as provision of Edinburgh Castle, at the time of the siege of the rock of Futherai (Fidra), "dum Jacobus magister de Douglas ipsam voluit edificasse (page 347).

in preparation for the reception of Mary of Gueldres.[1]

A bygone age is momentarily recalled by the mention in the accounts of 1449 of the death, at what must have been a very advanced age, of the widow of Robert Duke of Albany, daughter of Sir William Keith the marischal by Margaret Fraser, heiress of Cowie and Durris. Surviving her husband more than twenty-eight years, she died very shortly before the wedding of James II. A pension of £66, 13s. 4d., which she had received ever since the downfall of her husband's family, was continued for the term after her death, namely Whitsunday 1449, in payment of her debts.[2] Three years later there appears in the customs account of Aberdeen a further payment of £33, 6s. 8d., by the King's order, to John Lowel and Thomas Garden, executors of Muriella Duchess of Albany, for her debts and funeral expenses.[3]

The Princess of Gueldres, with a large suite, set sail from Flanders, "in thirteen great shippis and aue craike," escorted by the Chancellor Crichton, the Bishop of Dunkeld, and the Lord of Campvere, father of the Princess Mary's husband.[4] After a visit to the Isle of May, where the Princess paid her devotions at the Chapel of St. Andrew, she landed with her suite at Leith on the 18th of June 1449, and advanced on horseback to Edinburgh. On the 25th June the marriage contract was ratified under the Great Seal;[1] the marriage took place on the 3rd of July, and the coronation of the Queen almost immediately followed. Most of the details hitherto given of the marriage are taken from the pleasant and graphic narrative of D'Escouchy, who, though not himself on the spot, derived his information from those who were present. A few additional particulars are furnished by the rolls, which seem to show that the Queen and her suite first proceeded to the convent of St. Anthony at Leith, and thence advanced to Holyrood; £9 are allowed for the expenses of Alexander Naper, the Comptroller, at St. Anthony's convent and Holyrood, and for hire of a boat and other expenses connected with the Queen;[2] William Bully, one of the custumars of Edinburgh, is allowed £10 for his services ("laboribus ac diligenciis") regarding the marriage and Queen's coronation, and the expenses of the servants of the King and Queen;[3] £12 are paid to

[1] About the time of the coronation of James II., there was a room for the King's lords in the monastery of Holyrood, for the door of which a great lock was furnished by the custumars of Edinburgh (page 26). The accounts of 1450 are rendered at the monastery of Holyrood, and in 1454 the King's brewers brewed in the monastery as well as in the Castle of Edinburgh (page 619).

The passage, however, in the Asloan MS. (pp. 24, 41), on which they found this statement (which occurs also in the Extracta e variis Cronicis Scocie, p. 238), only states that these magnates were consenting parties to the marriage.

Allusions appear at this time and afterwards to various foreign retainers who came in the Queen's train. Henry Junem, a Dutchman, is keeper of her wardrobe,[2] and Herman, also a Dutchman, master of her stable.[3] Payments occur to Henry Van Velde or Vanderfelde, a Dutchman, formerly tutor (nutritor) of the Queen, and to his sons;[4] and there is mention of Walter Cuke and his son John Cuke, also Dutchmen, who had the rents of Strathmiglo in Fife for their fee.[5] An "Elizabeth de Gelria" is an annuitant from 1456 onwards.[6]

Meantime negotiations went on regarding a cessation of war with England, apparently without any reference to the already subsisting truce, which ought not to have expired till 1454.[7] A truce was first agreed to from 10th August to 20th September 1469; then down to 19th November 1449; and on 15th November 1449, the truce was made of indefinite duration, to be brought to an end, at the option of either party, on a notice of 180 days.[8] A payment of £10 to Snowdon herald, riding to England to the English King, with indication of a former journey of the same herald to England, has reference to these negotiations.[9]

Asloan manuscript,[1] Bishop William Turnbull said his first mass at Glasgow. Turnbull, the founder of the University of Glasgow, and the procurer of valuable privileges for that see and city, was one of the more remarkable prelates of his day. He had held office at the Court of Pope Eugenius IV., and accompanied Croyser on his mission as nuncio to cite Bishop Cameron to the Papal Court. The Exchequer accounts show that he was Bishop of Glasgow more than a year before the date in the Asloan Chronicle.[2] He had previously been Keeper of the Privy Seal, and Bishop of Dunkeld for a very short time.[3] We find the sum of £740 Scots or £300 Flemish, borrowed by the King from merchants of Edinburgh, Aberdeen, and Dundee, and paid to Italian merchants to defray the expenses of obtaining the bulls for the election.[4]

[1] Asloan MS., pp. 25, 41.

[2] Page 297. The account of the succession of the Bishops of Glasgow about this period in the preface to the Glasgow chartulary, is not quite accurate. Bishop Cameron, the Chancellor of James I., and vindicator of the State against Roman encroachments, died on Christmas Eve 1446, not 1447, (Asloan MS., pp. 6, 39). James Bruce, Chancellor, and Bishop of Dunkeld, who succeeded him, enjoyed the see but a short time, but did not, as there stated, die before confirmation or investiture. James Bishop of Glasgow and Chancellor is an Exchequer auditor on 19th June 1447 (page 258), but he must have died before the 4th October of that year, as the see is then said to be vacant (Chartulary of Glasgow, p. 366).

[3] Turnbull was elected successor to Bruce on the translation of the latter to Glasgow (Scotichronicon vol. i. p. 502), and seems to have been consecrated Bishop. He is so designed in the Exchequer accounts, page 310. See next note.

The sudden reverse of fortune which overtook the Livingstons in 1449 is one of the events of this reign about whose secret history it is difficult to form any plausible conjecture. About the time of the King's marriage, James Livingston, eldest son of Sir Alexander of Callendar, was promoted to the office of Great Chamberlain of Scotland.[1] A few weeks later he himself, his aged father, his brother Alexander, and other kinsmen and adherents of the house, including Robert Livingston, then Comptroller, and Robert Callendar, keeper of Dumbarton Castle, were suddenly laid hold of and imprisoned in the fortress of Blackness, the whole property of the family being at the same time put under arrest, and every officer who had been appointed by the Livingstons expelled from his post.[2] The parties thus arrested were arraigned before a Parliament held at Edinburgh on the 19th January 1449–50 ; and on the 22d January two of them were executed, namely Alexander Livingston, younger son of Sir Alexander,[3] and Robert Livingston, the Comptroller.[4] The head

[2] Asloan MS. pp. 25, 42.

[3] It was certainly not James the elder son, as stated by an error of inadvertency in the Asloan MS., but his brother Alexander, who was beheaded.

[4] Robert Livingston, designed of Middlebenyng and of Linlithgow, a cousin of the Livingstons of Callander, was probably the most considerable merchant in Linlithgow ; and his name occurs often in the accounts of the reign of James I. as well as James II., as custumar of Linlithgow, and master of works of Linlithgow Palace. He is, on one occasion at least, rewarded for his activity in the King's affairs (page 101), and had been recently employed on an embassy to England of the house, with his kinsman, James Dundas of Dundas, and other adherents, had their lives spared, but were attainted, and incarcerated in Dumbarton Castle. While there cannot be a doubt, from the narrative in Napier's charter of Philde already alluded to, that one of the crimes with which the Livingstones were charged was the treasonable imprisonment of the Queen-mother in 1439, it can hardly be supposed that this was the only offence for which they were tried; else the lives of the father and eldest son, who had the principal hand in this outrage, would not have been spared, while Robert Livingston, who seems not to have been directly implicated in it, and was a trusted friend of James I., was executed. Boece's supposition that those who were respited purchased their lives with large money payments, does not consist with the fact that the effects of all who had been found guilty were confiscated to the Crown.

Our historians prior to Tytler, following Boece, misdate by three years the proceedings against the Livingstons, and ascribe them to the Douglas influence. Tytler, giving the correct date from the Asloan manuscript, credits James with a steady resolve, like that of his father, to break the power of the great nobles, and supposes a deliberate plan to have been formed by him to crush both Livingstons and Douglases, and that by Kennedy's skilful management steps were taken against the former without seriously arousing the suspicions of the latter. If however Kennedy was the King's adviser as to the arrest, he was equally so a short time before, when James Livingston was invested with the office of Chamberlain ; and one cannot help suspecting that the arrest had really proceeded on some scheme by the Livingston faction, unfriendly to the Government, which had been brought to light between the two events, and of which, like many other transactions of this reign, no record has been preserved. Such a conjecture seems at least to be more probable than the arrest of six or seven members of a family for an act committed by three of them ten years before, which had been condoned by Parliament and by the Government then in power, and in pursuance of a settled purpose which it is difficult to reconcile with the later acts of this King's reign.

(page 304). He is first designed Comptroller in August 1448 (page 297), and was succeeded in that office by Alexander Naper, who had signalised himself by his defence of the Queen-mother. He is mentioned as deceased in the accounts of July 1440 (pages 370, 393, 419), and his lands in the burgh of Linlithgow as escheat (page 399). £123, 13s. 7d. are in 1450 allowed for payment of poor creditors who had furnished goods to Livingston as Comptroller for the King's use (page 471).

Whatever might previously have been the relations subsisting between the Earl of Douglas and the Livingston faction, the Great Seal Register informs us that Douglas was allowed to share to some extent in the spoils. By charter dated 22nd May 1449, Culter and Ogilface, part of the forfeited estate of Robert Livingston, and Blairmakkis, forfeited by Dundas, were bestowed on him.[1] On the 10th February 1449–50 he had grants from the forfeited Dundas estates, to the extent of half of Echlin and Dalmeny and half of Dundas.[2] The Asloan manuscript tells us that, on the arrest of the Livingstons, the brother of the laird of Dundas threw himself into Dundas castle, and defended it successfully against the King for some weeks, and that when at last it was surrendered, a part of the provisions and stores in it were bestowed on the Earl of Douglas.[3]

About the same time Strathaven was erected into a burgh of barony in favour of Douglas;[4] he obtained the marriage of his wife, Margaret of Douglas;[5] and the rolls contain mention of a free gift to him of £27, 9s. 4d.[6]

At the same Parliament which attainted the Livingstons, the Bishops obtained, at their entreaty seconded by that of the Queen, a boon which successive Popes had at an earlier period in vain sought to gain for them, the privilege of bequeathing their personal estate.[7]

On the 19th May 1450, the Queen had at Stirling Castle a prematurely born child, which lived but a few hours.[8]

1450 of a loan of £500 by William Lord Crichton to the King;[1] and the Great Seal Register contains a charter to him, on 12th June of that year, of the lands of Castellaw in the sheriffdom of Edinburgh (to which there is an obscure allusion in the accounts of 1444), in reward for his faithful counsel and services to the King, and in recompense for £2080, 14s. 6½d. advanced for the expenses of the King's household, and for a loan of £400 to the King.[2]

The jubilee at Rome in 1450 attracted a great concourse of visitors from all parts of Christendom, not the least distinguished among whom was William Earl of Douglas. Setting sail for Flanders, probably about the month of November of that year, with James Master of Douglas, his brother and heir-presumptive, Lord Hamilton, and a train of knights, gentlemen, and attendants, such as befitted a sovereign prince rather than a subject of the Scottish Crown, he made his way through France to the papal city. At Rome he experienced a reception in correspondence with the state in which he travelled. An English safe-conduct for the whole party, which appears in the "Rotuli Scotiæ," of date 12th November 1450 and good for three years,[3] was probably procured before their departure to enable them to return by England. On his arrival in England on his homeward journey, which must have occurred about the end of February or beginning of

March, Douglas was received with honours beyond what might have been considered due to the subject of a neighbouring state. Garter King of Arms was ordered to repair to the high seas to await his coming, as also to conduct him on his arrival to the King's presence, and to remain in attendance on him during his stay in England.[1] This stay was of some duration, if Law's manuscript be right in stating that he returned to Scotland on 7th April.

Bower's continuator says that Douglas returned "societate dispersa et habitu dissimulato," and his return was perhaps accelerated by events which were taking place at home. Disturbances had arisen during his absence in his territorial domains, whose administration he seems to have delegated to his youngest brother, John Douglas of Balveny. Law's manuscript, in which we have the only account of these proceedings on which it is possible to place any reliance,[2] represents three of the

[2] The following is the passage in the manuscript in question relating to Douglas's visit to Rome and its result. As it has never before been printed, it is here given entire :—

"1450. Jubileum hoc anno fuit Rome, quo tanta hominum multitudo accessit quanta uncquam antea accesserat. Ubi Willelmus comes de eodem navigavit cum licencia et regis Scotie benevolentia, accepitque secum Jacobum fratrem suum magistrum de eodem, dominum de Hammiltone, et familiam magnam ac honestam valde. Qui se nobiliter habuit in vestimentis, expensis, et omnibus factis suis ubique locorum. Quam ob rem a pontifice maximo ultra omnes peregrinos commendatus est. Attamen fama fuit, ut rei exitus comprobavit, quod Willelmus Trumbil, episcopus Glasguensis, Willelmus Crechton, miles, et Georgius Crechton, cum suis, conspirabant et affectabant mortem comitis de Douglass. Nam ex eorum consilio rex Jacobus secundus universa castra comitis obsedit et multos liberos tenentes de dicto comite occidit, reliquos ad suam pacem facto juramento accepit. Sed paulo post secundis afflatibus comes ministers on whose advice James most relied, the two Crichtons and Bishop Turnbull of Glasgow, as anxious to make what had occurred an excuse for entirely overthrowing the power of the Douglases. Acting on their advice the King besieged Douglas's strongholds, put many of his freeholders to death, and spared the rest on their taking the oath of fealty. The same authority tells us of an expedition of the King, immediately after Douglas's return, against Douglas Crag, a small fortress of the Earl's in Ettrick Forest, which he took and demolished.[1]

In the circumstances described it seems surprising to find the name of the Earl of Douglas, on 17th April 1451, as one of the commissioners sent to England to confer with the King of England's commissioners regarding certain violations of the truce.[2] As Warden of the Marches, his name could perhaps not have been left out; and an imperfect passage in the Asloan MS. seems to say in reference to this matter that the Earl did de Douglas vij Aprilis Scotiam cum suis sospes ingreditur. Sed rex statim exercitum contra comitem congregavit, mediis predictorum mortem comitis intendencium, et manu hostili ad Crag Douglass accessit, et accepto castro rex illud funditus evertebat."

[1] Boece represents James as capturing the castles of Lochmaben and Douglas during the Earl's absence abroad, and then garrisoning the former and razing the latter to the ground. Douglas Castle was, however, as will be seen, still standing in 1452; and Lochmaben, with the rest of Annandale, was in the King's hands. Our historical romancer perhaps magnified the destruction of the tower on Douglas Crag on the Yarrow into the demolition of the principal stronghold of the family.

not accompany the other commissioners, but sent his seal with them.[1]

On 12th May 1451 an English safe-conduct, good for a year, was granted to the Earl of Douglas, his brothers Sir James, Archibald Earl of Moray, and Hugh Earl of Ormond, with a company of knights and gentlemen as numerous as had accompanied him to Rome.[2] Whether or not the Earl availed himself of this passport, his brother James did so. According to the Asloan manuscript he went to London, remained a long time there, was much made of, and was suspected of carrying on intrigues prejudicial to his country.[3] Regarding the accuracy of these surmises the English records leave little room for doubt. On 11th December 1451, £13 were paid to Garter King of Arms, lately sent by the King's command to travel with Sir James Douglas on his coming to the King, to bring the said James to the King's presence at Winchester, Salisbury, and elsewhere, and to bring him back to Scotland.[4]

Whether James had any certain knowledge of these traffickings with the Yorkist party, who were now uppermost in England, whether he hoped against hope that Douglas might yet be won over by kindness, or whether he felt himself unable to measure his strength with the Earl, we find Douglas, at the Parliament which met at Edinburgh on the 25th June 1451, submitting himself to the King's mercy, and James, at the request of the Queen and the three Estates,[1] restoring to him nearly the whole of his lands, including Galloway east of the Cree, which though in reality only his in right of his wife, was re-granted him with remainder, failing his issue male, to his brothers in succession. The offices of Warden of the Middle Marches and Sheriff of Lanark are included in these charters; and some of the grants are declared valid notwithstanding the King's minority, and notwithstanding any crimes that may have been committed by Douglas and his predecessors.[2] Four months later, in a Parliament held at Stirling, the Earldom of Wigtown, and Stewarton, which had been excluded in the charters of June (the former because life-rented by the Countess Margaret, daughter of Robert III.) were added to Douglas's domains; and, in the case of Wigtown, as of East Galloway, the remainder, failing Douglas's issue male, was to his brothers in succession.[3]

On 10th July 1451 the Queen was delivered of a son, afterwards James III.[4] Two successive Inverkeithing accounts tell us of an inner garment of the sainted Queen Margaret, which was credited with virtues of a special kind and must have been among the treasures of Dumfermline Abbey, being brought to Mary of Gueldres in her confinement.[1] The Prince seems to have been born at Stirling while the King was at the Parliament at Edinburgh, and the tidings were brought him by his faithful servant, Robert Nory, to whom the King in reward for his news granted the lands of Ward of Gudy in Menteith and Queenshalch in the sheriffdom of Stirling, by charter dated 1st June 1452.[2] The baptism took place at St. Andrews, apparently some months later. Schoriswood, acting for the Comptroller, is credited, in his account extending from April 1452 to June 1453, with the expenses of the King's journey to St. Andrews to the baptism of the Prince.[3] of Scotland, vol i p. xxxvii., his parliamentary revocation, on 10th July 1476, of Acts prejudicial to the Crown, shows that he had then, and probably on that very day, attained the age of twenty-five.

[1] The account of the bailies of Inverkeithing, audited nine days after the Prince's birth, and going back to 9th June 1450, has a memorandum appended to the effect that 6s. are to be allowed in the next year's account, "pro naulo Willelmi Crag, deferentis camisiam beate Margarete regine ad dominam nostram reginam in suo puerperio infra tempus compoti" (page 447), and that sum is accordingly allowed at the following audit (page 512). The "puerperium" was therefore the birth of James III., and not the premature confinement of 19th May 1450. "Sanct Margaretis sark" was put to the same use at the birth of James V. At the same Parliament at which the King gave his lands back to the Earl of Douglas, he also bestowed on the Earl of Crawford, "in recompense for his faithful services" certain lands in the earldom of Menteith forfeited by James Livingston.[1] James's actings to these two Earls, who were known to be in close alliance with each other, irresistibly suggest that he was not at that time thoroughly alive to the danger with which the Crown was threatened by the overgrown power of Douglas. He must at least have been unaware of the fact that a formal league, offensive and defensive, existed between the Earls of Douglas and Crawford against all men, not excluding the King. But the discovery a few months later of this treasonable compact, along with some unusually flagrant acts of lawlessness committed by Douglas,[2] thoroughly roused the alarm and indignation of the King and his advisers. James, however, before resorting to extreme measures, seems to have been disposed to try the effect of a personal conference and remonstrance. On the 22nd of February 1451–2,

[2] These are said to have included an attempt to assassinate Lord Crichton, the harrying of the lands of Sir John Herries and hanging him in defiance of the King's command, incidents related by Boece and Hume of Godscroft. The well-known story of the incarceration by Douglas of M'Lellan of Bomby for his loyalty to his sovereign, the mission by James to Sir Patrick Gray to request him to surrender to him his prisoner, and the execution of M'Lellan by Douglas's orders while he was entertaining Gray to dinner, is first told by Lindsay of Pitscottie, being one of the few passages in his account of this reign which are not copied from Boece. It has a vraisemblance that disposes one to accept it as true.

under the security of a safe-conduct to visit the King at Stirling Castle, and after he had been courteously received and had dined and supped, James requested him to withdraw to a private chamber, where he began to remonstrate against his illegal confederacy, and charge him to break it. Douglas having answered with insolence, mutual reproaches followed, and the interview ended with James, in the heat of passion, stabbing the Earl with his poniard. The courtiers rushing in, seconded the King's blow with repeated strokes, and Douglas fell, pierced with twenty-six wounds.

The Earl of Ross is said to have been a party to the league with Crawford which cost Douglas his life. We do not know on any sufficient authority the date of the bond; but it seems more likely that the third party to it was Alexander Lord of the Isles and Earl of Ross, who figured so prominently in the reign of James I., than his minor son, Earl John, who succeeded him in May 1449.[1] But some proceedings of Earl John, nearly synchronous with Douglas's death, and narrated in the Asloan manuscript, require a brief notice, in respect of a few glimpses of light thrown on them by the Exchequer rolls.

[1] According to the "Breve Cronicle of the Earles of Ross," Earl Alexander was buried at the Chanonry of Ross, on the 8th of May 1449.

John Earl of Ross, who, according to modern historians and genealogists, succeeded in mature age,[1] was in reality not quite fifteen years old when his father died.[2] The King, in the exercise of his right under the casualty of marriage, selected as wife for the boy-earl a daughter of James Livingston younger of Callander, promising a suitable fortune with her. The marriage took place; but the disgrace and attainder of the Livingstons speedily followed, and the King had failed to keep his word as to the lady's portion.[3] His own private grievance, rather than the news of Douglas's death, which could scarcely have reached these northern parts, seems to have impelled the young Earl in March 1451–2 to take possession of the castles of Inverness, Urquhart, and Ruthven in Badenoch,

[1] Gregory (Highlands and Isles of Scotland, p. 55) calls him "The aged Lord of the Isles" in 1490, when he could only have been fifty-six.

[2] There is frequent mention in the accounts of 1450, 1451, and 1452, of lands being in ward by the death of the Earl of Ross (pages 393, 394, 462, 516). In September 1456 the bailie of Carrick debits himself with £10 as relief due from the lands of Grennane by the Earl of Ross when sasine was given him, and the fermes are received for the last time by the Crown at Whitsunday 1455 (vol. vi. page 236). Similarly, in the account of the sheriff of Aberdeen for the three years preceding September 1456, it is stated that, while the lands of Kynedward have been in ward for those three years, John Earl of Ross, though a minor, has been allowed entry to them (vol. vi. page 159). The age thus proved of Earl John makes it clear that Celestine and Hugh, the ancestors of Lochalsh and Sleat, could not possibly have been his younger lawful brothers.

and demolish the last-named fortress.[1] His father-in-law, Livingston, who had made his peace with the King, on news of these proceedings escaped—we are told—from Holyrood to the Highlands, and was placed in command of Urquhart, alleging that he had the King's "writ and walx" appointing him keeper of the castle for three years. And instead of James taking prompt measures against Ross and Livingston, we find this irregular mode of enforcing the King's promise—in respect, perhaps, that the King was in the wrong, and the principal actor in it a youth of seventeen—quietly condoned. Livingston receives his fee as keeper of Inverness Castle for the three years ending Whitsunday 1454, that is from Martinmas 1451,[2] and, some time before July 1454,[3] he is reinstated in the office of Great Chamberlain, which he had held at the time of his forfeiture.

[1] Asloan MS., pp. 15, 43. Tytler and Gregory date these proceedings in March 1451 (according to modern computation), that is, a year earlier than as here related. Inverness and Urquhart are said in the Asloan MS. to have been captured in "March 1451," which would most naturally mean March 1451–2; and if in the second part of the printed chronicle, the order of the entries rather suggests the date assumed by Tytler, no such inference can be drawn from the same entries as printed verbatim in the first part. The rolls indicate that Sir Thomas Ogilvy continued keeper of Inverness and Urquhart castles down to July 1451.—Pages 380, 405, 421, 441.

safe-conduct was an act utterly indefensible, and calculated greatly to lower the estimation in which James was beginning to be held both at home and abroad. With Douglas's friends it obliterated the memory of many acts of forbearance and generosity; and it was the signal of an armed rising of the Earl's relations and retainers, and of those of his confederate the Earl of Crawford.

The heir to the earldom of Douglas, James, immediate younger brother of Earl William, had been originally intended for the Church, if he did not actually become a churchman. He was a twin with Archibald Earl of Moray, and the seniority of the two brothers being doubtful, they entered on 25th April 1447 into an indenture to let the matter be decided by their mother and elder brother; and the result was a finding, which was confirmed under the Great Seal of date 9th January 1449–50, that James was the senior.[1] Before this date, in an account audited 18th July 1449, James is called "Master of Douglas";[2] and he distinguished himself, as already mentioned, at a tournament held shortly before the King's marriage.

James, now Earl of Douglas, arriving at Stirling on 27th March 1452 with his brother Hugh Earl of Ormond, James Lord Hamilton, and a force of about one hundred men, blew twenty-four horns as an act of feudal defiance; after which they dragged the King's safe-conduct at a horse's tail through the streets, and burned and pillaged the town. They seem then to have laid siege to Dalkeith, which, though the property of a Douglas, was held for the Crown, and on being repulsed from this castle, to have wasted the surrounding country.[1] The King, who on the 12th of April had despatched a messenger to the French Court to explain the circumstances of Douglas's death,[2] made his way to Perth, with the intention of joining the Earl of Huntly, who, as his lieutenant, was marching against Crawford. But on the 18th of May, before he could accomplish this, Huntly and Crawford encountered each other near Brechin, where a hotly contested action ended in the total route of Crawford's force.[3] While Huntly was thus engaged, Douglas's brother, Archibald Earl of Moray, had been harrying his lands of Strathbogie, after which Huntly in turn revenged himself by laying waste the province of Moray.[4]

Parliament was summoned to meet at Edinburgh on the 12th of June 1452. Douglas, who had gone

[1] The burning of Dalkeith was one of the acts charged against Douglas in 1455. But that it took place exactly at this date appears to rest only on the authority of Boece and Hume of Godscroft.

so far as to offer his homage to the King of England,[1] had a cartel of defiance to James, under his seal and those of Ormond and Hamilton, placarded by night on the door of the hall where the Estates met.[2] Parliament formally justified the slaughter of the late Earl of Douglas, in respect that he had renounced his allegiance, and his treason was manifest.[3] The Earl of Crawford was attainted.[4] Sir James Crichton of Frendraught, eldest son of the Chancellor, was, the Asloan manuscript tells us, "beltit Earl of Moray.[5]" Sir George Crichton the admiral, was belted Earl of Caithness; Lord Hay was belted Earl of Erroll;[6] and various [5] Asloan MS., pp. 11, 49. If the standing investiture of the Earldom of Moray was still that of 1371–2 (Reg. Mag. Sig., p. 88), his wife was de jure Countess of Moray, and had, through the Douglas influence, been supplanted by her younger sister; but it seems more probable that there had been an intervening resignation and re-grant, not now extant or on record, in favour of heirs male.

[6] Belting, or "cinctura gladii," by the sovereign, was, in Scotland as elsewhere, a usual ceremony on the erection of a new earldom, regarding which we have abundance of extant evidence. An earl was often said to be "made" earl at the time when he was belted (as in the case of the Earl of Crawford, vol. iii. page 460); but it is an entire misapprehension to suppose that an earl was ever made by belting alone. Belting was an inaugural ceremony which presupposed a written charter. The contrary hypothesis, which at one time received some support from the dicta of one or two English law lords in Scottish Peerage Claims, is irreconcilable with facts, and originally suggested itself as a mode of explaining the circumstance that, while our records abound in original charters of "comitatus" to persons who immediately afterwards are designed earls, in scarcely any of these is the title of earl specifically mentioned; and that neither in the records nor in any private charter-chest has a patent or charter of the dignity of earl been ever seen of an earlier date than 1600, when James VI., anticipating the near prospect of the opening to him of the English succession, bestowed in English fashion the title of Earl of Winton by patent on Lord Seton. The true barons who had given active support to the Crown were rewarded with lands or with the dignity of a Lord of Parliament.

A summons had been issued for an army to assemble on Pentland Muir immediately after the Parliament; and James, at the head of a force of 30,000 men, marched southwards, according to the Asloan MS.,[1] to Peebles, Selkirk, Dumfries, and other sundry parts, doing no good, but destroying corn and orchards, and harrying the lands of many who were the King's friends. This expedition had nevertheless other results besides those here commemorated. A copy has been preserved[2] of a written Act of Submission by the Earl of Douglas, dated at Douglas, 28th August 1452, and signed by him and Hamilton, in which he binds himself, inter alia, to return to his allegiance, to renounce all rancour against those who had a hand in his brother's death, to do his duty as March Warden, and take no steps to recover the earldom of explanation, which forces itself on every student of Scottish records who takes the subject up from the historical side, is that the dignity of an earl is in all cases included in the grant of "comitatus," whether specified or not. It may be further remarked that the belting theory, were it otherwise tenable, would fail as an explanation of the fact that after a re-grant of the "comitatus" following on a resignation in favour of a new line of heirs, though there has been no express conveyance of the dignity, the new heir becomes an earl. There has never been supposed to be any belting in such cases.

Occasionally, for the sovereign's convenience, the belting preceded in date, instead of following the charter.

Wigtown or lordship of Stewarton till these are voluntarily restored by the Queen.

A little light is thrown on the details of James's progress by the accounts audited in 1453. William Lauder of Haltoun or Hatton, had been one of the brilliant company of knights and gentlemen who accompanied the Earl of Douglas to Rome; he is also associated with him in the passport of 12th May already alluded to. According to the Asloan MS., he was the messenger by whom James sent his safe-conduct to the late Earl of Douglas, and it was he who had conducted Douglas into the King's presence.[1] He had probably been selected for the office as being known to be a friend of Douglas. That a sentence of forfeiture then stood against him, and that he soon afterwards died, appears from a charter, granted on 18th April 1452, to the Queen, of the castle and lands of Haltoun and others forfeited by the late William Lauder.[2] On the King's march southwards he found the tower of Hatton held out, probably by Lauder's representative, against him. In the notices of the siege, one of the otherwise unmentioned incidents of that expedition, the rolls tell us not only of the construction of a "sow," but of the King's great bombard being brought into use.[1] Sir Alexander Hume, then one of the March Wardens, is provided with victuals and shafts of lances, for the defence of the house of Hume, at an expense of £20.[2] We have bowstaves purchased from Dutchmen and sent to the King's wardrobe at Edinburgh Castle, and twenty-eight ells of English cloth at 15s. the ell furnished to the King's archers.[3] Alan Coltart is paid £5 as guide to the King and his host.[4]

So completely had the King taken Douglas back into favour, that he became a consenting party to a step taken by Douglas to make his title to his Galloway possessions more secure, namely, his marriage with the "Fair Maid of Galloway," his brother's widow;[5] and Douglas was,

Under an entry of £195, 9s. 5d. in the same account are conjoined the following charges: payments to men and horses at the time of the siege; for iron helmets called sallets for the King's servants and archers; for pitch, tar, carriages for conveyance of timber, fees and expenses of masons and carpenters at the tower of Haltoun; to couriers sent with precepts of Parliament, Council General and Exchequer, and letters to assemble the King's host; for the King's expenditure at play (in ludis et disportis), and outlay in connexion with the King's journey to St. Andrews to the baptism of the Prince (page 607).

on 18th, April 1453, appointed commissioner to conclude a truce with England.[1]

While Boece and the historians who borrow from him are silent as to Douglas's submission, they narrate in great detail a progress of James northwards in the spring of 1453, to receive the submission of the Earl of Crawford, which was tendered with every conceivable outward token of contrition; and the Earl, it is said, after being restored to his estates, became devotedly loyal to James. He had, however, but short time to evince the sincerity of his repentance, as his death occurred in the autumn of the same year.[2] The Asloan MS. makes no

[1] Rotuli Scotiæ, ii. p. 367.

[2] Boece gives 1454 as the year of Crawford's death. In the Asloan MS. he is said to have died in September 1454, a date which has been altered in the reprint to 1453. This editorial correction is warranted by an entry in the account of the chamberlain of the King's lands north of Dee, rendered in July 1454, to the effect that Auchterellon was in ward by Crawford's death at the two terms of the account, namely Martinmas 1453 and Whitsunday 1454 (page 653). It must be supposed that the payments made to the Earl by the custumars of Dundee and Aberdeen corresponding to these terms (the latter "by compulsion") were exacted in advance from the first customs in their hands (pages 628, 630).

An Act of the first Parliament of James I., directing that no payments should in future be made from the customs and burgh mails to any who could not show the King's writ for them, swept away nearly all the yearly payments which figure so prominently in the burgh rolls of Robert II., Robert III., and the regencies; almost the sole exception being an annuity of 100 marks from the customs of Dundee paid to Alexander second Earl of Crawford, for whose payment the King, on being satisfied that it was a hereditary pension originally conceded by Robert Bruce, issued a precept (vol. iv. page 531). But no sooner was James I. dead than this Earl, and his son and successor Earl David, began, in addition to the 100 marks alluded to, to receive or exact annual payments amounting in all to 219 marks, namely, 19 marks from the fermes of Banff (page 325), 100 marks from the customs and £4 from the fermes of Aberdeen, and 40 marks from the customs of Montrose. There are continual protests in the accounts that these allusion to his penitence and submission, and in chronicling his death, describes him as "a rigorus man and ane felloun," who "held all Angus in his bandoun, and was richt inobedient to the King."[1] The fact however that his attainder was reversed before his death does not seem to admit of doubt.

Various particulars occur in the accounts about an episode which deserves a few words of explanation, were it only for the characteristic light thrown sums are not due, and have been extorted by violence; and this is especially the case in the payments from the Montrose customs, representing an annuity personal to the first Earl of Crawford, who died in 1398, which had never been received by the second Earl during the whole period of the Albany regencies, when claims of the kind were so readily admitted. The 100 marks from the customs of Aberdeen, which under Albany had been continued to the second Earl, was in its origin personal to his father, granted for his life only, and for retinue to Robert III. and David Duke of Rothesay.

These annual payments went on during the whole time of Alexander fourth Earl; and, though often asserted to be made illegally, were allowed by the auditors, sometimes with the saving addition "consulendus est rex" (page 283), or the qualifying "de quibus respondebit" (pages 341, 378). In the case of the Montrose payments the form was adhered to of keeping them up as an increasing debt against the Earl (pages 115, 131, 153, 301, 316); but in 1449 these arrears are alluded to as a hopeless debt (page 340), and in later accounts they disappear.

After the death of the fourth Earl there are a few partial payments in the Aberdeen and Montrose accounts to the guardian of the infant heir, Walter Lindsay of Beaufort, and the widowed Countess (vol. vi. pages 24, 42, 304, 586); but these are soon discontinued, and the King is stated to have torn up the mandate which he had granted authorizing them. At the Martinmas term o 1452, we find the Earl receiving all his annuities as usual, though he was of course then an attainted felon.

The "Tiger Earl" had a pursuivant named after the family motto, "Endure," to whom we find annual payments made of £10 from the customs and £3, 6s. 8d. from the fermes of Aberdeen, from the term following the Earl's death down to the death of James II., generally said to be "ex gracia," or by the King's mandate till recalled (pages 630, 639; vol. vi. pages 129, 135, 304, 320, 404, 501, 510, 593, 602). In the early part of the reign of James III., he receives the same annuities as "Lyndesay herald."

by it on the condition of the settled parts of Scotland even in an interval of comparative tranquillity, —the siege of Blackness. It is alluded to in the Asloan MS., in a passage ranked by the editor under the year 1455, but which the accounts shew to belong to 1453.

Sir George Crichton the Admiral, of whom mention has been already made, had acquired over and above his paternal estate of Cairns in Midlothian, the lands of Barnton in the same county, with Blackness and other possessions in Linlithgowshire, through the relations of his second wife, Janet Borthwick, the widow of James Douglas Lord Dalkeith, whose first wife was sister of James III.[1] The King had in addition bestowed on him lands in Annandale,[2] and an extensive territory in Caithness, resigned by the elder daughter of the last Dunbar Earl of Moray, and her husband, the Chancellor Crichton's son.[3] At the Parliament of June 1452 he was, as has been seen, belted Earl of Caithness, and immediately afterwards his whole lands in southern parts were, on his resignation, annexed to the earldom of Caithness, and re-granted to him and his assignees.[4] Though he had a son by his first marriage, and a daughter Janet the issue of his second wife, he chose as assignee the King, into whose hands his newly got earldom seems to have been resigned, without even reserving his own liferent.[1] This destination was so far modified in January 1452-3, that Barnton was, on his and his wife's resignation, settled on the daughter alluded to.[2] In the month of May 1453 the son thus excluded took violent possession of Blackness Castle, and incarcerated his father there; on which the King, on behalf of the Earl, laid siege to that fortress, which capitulated, the Asloan MS. says, after a siege of nine or ten days.[3] The entries in the Exchequer rolls seem to indicate that the siege lasted twice that period, and tell us further that not the King only, but the Queen, was present, and that the place was invested by sea. One Laurence Poke was paid £12 for his services and those of his ship and his sailors for twenty days at the siege.[4] There is no express mention of the use of ordnance; but twelve stone of iron at a cost of 32s. were provided by the cus-

Janet seems to have been a daughter of the Earl and Countess of Caithness, born before or during the subsistence of the marriage of the latter with the Lord of Dalkeith, and therefore illegitimate. "Filia naturalis" may not in every case mean an illegitimate daughter; but the persistent way in which Janet is so called in this charter, in addition to her being brought in after the "lawful" children of the same marriage, leads unavoidably to the conclusion that such is the meaning of the phrase in the present instance.

tumars of Linlithgow.[1] £10. 13s. 10d. were allowed to the custumars of Edinburgh for barrels (pipe) and other instruments purchased by them and sent by sea to Blackness.[2] Bows were sent to Blackness "ad usum regine;"[3] 36s. were allowed for the keeper of the Queen's horses at Stirling during the siege;[4] furnishings to the King's household were sent to Blackness by the Comptroller;[5] and the King's serjeant, in his account of the Crown property around Linlithgow, was allowed 53s. 4d. for his great labours and expenses at the siege.[6] When the place at last capitulated, it was on the condition that the crown lands of Strathurd should be made over to the younger Crichton, as the price of his renouncing all claim to the lands which his father had acquired in Lothian.

On the death of the Earl (or ex-Earl) of Caithness, which occurred the following year, such of his lands as had not already been resigned to the King reverted to the Crown, with the exception of Cairns and Strathurd, which were inherited by his son, and Barnton and Tibberis, which continued in possession of the daughter already alluded to and her descendants. That lady married in 1454 John, son and apparent heir of Robert Lord Maxwell, when she had a charter of Tibberis from her father.[7]

The difficulty of understanding why Douglas, after having been restored to favour and to his territorial position, should again have conspired and rebelled against his sovereign, has led some modern historians to conceive that he literally aspired to the Scottish Crown, and to frame untenable genealogical hypotheses regarding the ground of his supposed claim. He however only aimed at the sovereignty of Scotland in the sense of being the most powerful person in the realm. The allegiance of the Earl of Douglas, and of some of the other chief magnates who had rights of regality, was hardly more than nominal. They had their barons who held of them, their heralds and pursuivants, their councils of retainers analogous to the Parliament of the nation; and they chafed at any interference with their acts by the King, whose authority they were on all occasions disposed to weaken. Taking into account the potent influence of family feuds, we cannot wonder if Douglas would balance in his own mind the injuries and mortifications inflicted on his family during the course of the reign against his restoration to favour in 1452. His elder brother had been assassinated by the King's hand; his younger brother had been deprived by the King of the earldom of Moray; Wigtown and Stewarton were in the Queen's hands; and he perhaps considered that he had a right to Annandale.[1] He might seriously doubt whether James's pardon was sincere, or whether, when the King of Scots felt strong enough, he might not make another effort to crush his power. Douglas's distrust of James was studiously fostered by the party who had the upper hand in England, by whom he was flattered and fêted, as Earl William had been before him. As the aggressions by our countrymen on England were often committed at the instigation of France and to serve her purposes, so England at that time did what it could to make the Douglases a thorn in the side of the King of Scots.

In the month of May 1453,[2] the Asloan MS. tells us, Douglas paid a visit to the young Earl of Ross in Knapdale, and bestowed on him and his people handsome presents of wine, silk, and English cloths, receiving gifts of fur in return; and it was afterwards believed that the predatory expedition which followed, in which Douglas took no

[1] In a safe-conduct from the King of England, dated 22nd May 1453, he is designed "Jacobum comitem de Douglas, de Wigtone, et de Annandale, dominum de Galway.—Rotuli Scotiæ, ii. p. 362. Possibly however "Annandale" is only a scribe's mistake for Avondale (Auandale). The resemblance of these two words as written is apt to be misleading.

[2] Asloan MS., pp. 13, 54, 55. The naval raid of Donald Balloch certainly belongs to 1453 and not 1455. The three paragraphs in the chronicle alluded to, relating to Douglas's interview with the Earl of Ross, the siege of Blackness, and the raid of Donald of the Isles, are evidently intended to be read consecutively. The first is dated "12th May" without any year; the second, "that same month and year;" the third, "the said year the tenth day of July." They are all therefore descriptive of events of the same year; and the references to the siege of Blackness in the Exchequer accounts leave no doubt that that year was 1453.

ostensible part, had been secretly contrived at this meeting. In July the naval force of the Isles, including a hundred galleys and five or six thousand men under command of Donald Balloch of Isla, who had in the previous reign caused considerable disturbances in the Highlands, and having with them, it was said, an illegitimate son of the fifth Earl of Douglas, landed at Innerkip in Renfrewshire, and began the work of burning and plunder. Thence they passed over to the Cumbrays and afterwards to Arran, where they took Brodick Castle, levelled it to the ground, and carried off a considerable booty, exacting tribute in money, malt, and marts from the inhabitants of Bute. The slaughter, however, was small in proportion to the force engaged.[1] No direct mention occurs in the accounts of Bute and Arran of this harrying or fine; but the fee of the keeper of Brodick Castle, which is a regularly recurring item from 1444 to 1453, ceases in succeeding years.

The aged and experienced Chancellor, William Lord Crichton, who was alive at the audit of July 1453, died before that of July 1454.[2] In August 1454, according to the Asloan MS. died Sir George Crichton (the ex-Earl of Caithness) at Edinburgh, and "Schir James Lord of Crechtoun decessit at Dunbar, and it was haldin fra the King a little quhile, and syne gevin till him."[3] James has here been not unnaturally thought to be a clerical slip for William; but this supposition is not borne out by the Exchequer accounts, which indicate that while the Chancellor was dead before the date given by the chronicler, his son James Lord Crichton, who is said in the Peerages to have survived till 1469, outlived his father but a very short time, and was dead before Martinmas 1454.[1]

Of the same date we are told of certain disturbances in Annandale, caused by a family afterwards prominent in that district. Soon after Annandale became crown demesne, John Carruthers of Mouswald had been appointed keeper of the fortress of Lochmaben, and had an annuity of apparently about £40 paid him, partly from the fermes of the burgh of Dumfries, and partly from those of Annandale.[2] He is also mentioned as the receiver of large payments for the household expenses on the occasion of visits of the King and Queen to Lochmaben.[3] In August 1454, according to the Asloan MS.,[4] the castle was betrayed by the treachery of the porter to the two sons of the laird of Johnston, who imprisoned Carruthers, his sons and his friends, and took possession of the fortress; and the King, to the general astonishment, allowed Johnston's sons to retain the keeping of the castle

"to his profit." Accordingly, in the accounts of 1455, we find Herbert Johnston receiving the fees formerly paid to Carruthers,[1] and the year following the keeper is Sir Andrew Stewart, afterwards Lord Avondale.[2]
